Who becomes a real estate appraiser?

Anyone! If your students are taking courses in finance, accounting, business administration, architecture, law, computer science, math, statistics, economics, real estate, history, sociology, English, etc., and if they like to solve complex and challenging problems, real estate appraising just might be the career they are looking for.

What do appraisers do?

Real property appraisal is the valuation of all interests, benefits and rights inherent in the ownership of physical real estate. Appraisals are required for just about any type of property including homes, apartment buildings, condominiums, office buildings, shopping centers, industrial sites, hotels, farms, etc.

Appraisers conduct research, analyze, and then develop an opinion of value that lenders, investors, property owners, buyers, accountants, attorneys, government entities, or others rely upon.

Why should university students consider appraising as a profession?

The increasing shortage of appraisers to complete timely appraisals, along with the need for a more diverse appraiser workforce, makes real estate appraising a very attractive career choice. In addition, appraisal and real estate organizations, as well as state and federal agencies, have made it a priority to create a more ethnic, racial, and gender diversified appraisal workforce to ensure public understanding and trust. Residential appraisers, for example, play a vital role in homeownership by providing the appraisals that lenders use for mortgages.

How does a student become a real estate appraiser?

Appraiser Trainees must successfully complete three qualifying education courses to meet the minimum education criteria established by the Appraisal Qualifications Board (AQB).

An Appraiser Trainee works under the direct supervision of a Certified Appraiser and may appraise the properties that the Supervising Appraiser is permitted to appraise. An appraiser can also become a Licensed Residential Real Property Appraiser, Certified Residential Real Property Appraiser, or Certified General Real Property Appraiser.

When can students begin taking real estate appraisal courses? In college?

Yes, your students can take real estate appraisal courses while in college! The Appraisal Institute licenses its courses to local colleges for their own academic (college credit) as well as professional education (non-credit) departments. Appraisal Institute courses have been approved by the Appraisal Qualifications Board and approved for state licensure by all 52 jurisdictions. For example two foundation classes, Basic Appraisal Principles and Basic Appraisal Procedures, are often offered at universities for 3 hours of college credit each semester. If the class is taught by an Appraisal Institute instructor, it's possible students can earn both college degree credit AND appraisal education licensure credit. Thus, saving your students both time and money towards obtaining appraisal trainee status while in college – rather than waiting until after graduating from college to begin their appraisal careers! What are some reasons appraisers love their jobs?

The Appraisal Institute wants to help the valuation profession grow by helping attract the next generation of appraisers. According to several of the organization's Designated members, reasons to consider becoming an appraiser include:

Continuous learning

"The best parts of being an appraiser would be the continuous learning opportunities from completing difficult assignments. I've been in the industry 15 years, and still to this day I feel like one of the best parts is that I learn something new every day." - Melissa Downing, MAI.

Independent thinking

Appraisers are paid to generate opinions of value. Using data, research and analysis, an appraiser relies on his or her education, expertise, and experience to provide their client a credible, reliable opinion of value.

Flexible schedule

"I love the flexibility that the profession is able to give to me. Appraisers also have the option as to where they want to work, whether that is in an office or working on site." - Heather Placer, MAI, SRA.

Variety of opportunities

"There are many opportunities associated with the appraisal profession. From working in a bank to an assessment office to being an independent consultant, appraisers are needed across the country." - Barbara Cantrell, MAI.

Financially rewarding

"Appraisal can be a very worthwhile profession financially. Valuation is a very high-income skill, and if you can learn that skill, the reward can be great." - Eric Schneider, MAI, SRA, AI-GRS.
